Mum Production In Full Swing At Five Acre Farm

Every year, Five Acre Farm in Northfield, MA sells over 50,000 mums, a lengthy process that starts now. Working beneath the blistering June sun, a team of workers begins by laying out miles of irrigation lines on a seven-acre field. These lines, or drip tubes, feed and nourish the mums, and are run by a series of clocks that are programmed to irrigate each section of the field for a specified amount of time, based on plant size and weather conditions. The system is shut down when it rains.

Once the drip lines are unrolled and put into place by workers, they are then attached to the main water lines in the field. When the field is ready, a separate crew of workers plants young mum plants into their finished containers, which are placed on transport carts and brought directly out to the field. Workers then place them under the drip lines, where they will be watered and monitored daily.

"We start now so we can grow the best product," explains Will Randall. The end result is a stunning crop of mums in various colors, sold in the Five
