50 Years Of Conservation Education

In 1970, Eleanor Briggs founded what would become the Harris Center for Conservation Education in her grandmother's former home in Hancock. She named the organization after her beloved cat, Harris, who she felt "represented a certain wildness, humor, and savvy, as well as strong instincts – all elements needed for a successful environmental education center." By the late 1970s, the Harris Center had chosen the bobcat as its symbol, a reminder of the wildness just outside the door.

Today, more than 50 years later, Harris Center teacher-naturalists work with nearly 3,000 students in 30 Monadnock Region schools annually. The Center offers more than 100 local community programs and outings for the general public each year. As a land trust, the Harris Center has directly protected more than 24,000 acres of land in the Monadnock Region for people and wildlife alike. The Harris Center has played an integral role in stitching together a 36,000-acre SuperSanctuary of connected protected lands in the towns of Antrim, Greenfield, Hancock, Harrisville, Nelson, Peterborough, Stoddard, and Windsor. Such land conservation efforts preserve air, soil, and water; ensure that wildlife have room to roam; and provide fantastic opportunities for outdoor recreation. The Center also supports conservation research on their protected lands – and throughout the Monadnock Region – via undergraduate, graduate, and other professional study, as well as their very popular citizen science initiatives. At its core, the Harris Center works to help people fall in love with nature where they live.
